A simple method of recording and analyzing surface electromyographic (EMG) activity of the abdominal muscles is described. The EMG method is simple, and provides for excellent accuracy and consistency. This method can be used for recording and analyzing resting activity and fatiguing activity of the abdominal muscles, not only in healthy subjects but also in patients. The system described will provide a useful reference for the measurement of the activity of the abdominal muscles in many clinical situations. The principal objective of this Core is to provide the means to produce C3H/HeJ mice transgenic for Thy-1.2, for subsequent experiments with this new rodent model of experimental allergic encephalomyelitis (EAE). The reasons for selecting the C3H/HeJ background for Thy-1.2 transgenic mice are that (1) the presence of microglia and astrocytes has been demonstrated in C3H
